The project reported here has benefited greatly from the guidance, suggestions and interest of many people, and their contributions are gratefully acknowledged.

In the Department of Human Services, Calvin Graham and Justin Mc Dermott guided the project from its inception to completion, and Jeremy Maddox is thanked for his assistance on data matters.

Discussions with participants in the Culturally Equitable Gateways Strategy (CEGS) ensured that the research was kept relevant to practice in planning and delivery of community care for CALD communities. The CEGS Reference Group raised many questions for investigation, only some of which could be answered by this research project. Special thanks are due to Katherine Wositzky, CEGS Consultant at the Municipal Association of Victoria, for her advice on the wider Strategy, and to Jenny Ashby, CEGS Consultant at the Victorian Ethnic Communities Council, for the opportunity to participate in the CEGS Forum held in early November 2005.

As co-researchers, Prof Michael Clyne and Dr Sandra Kipp at the Melbourne University Research Unit for Multilingual and Cross-Cultural Communication provided expert insights into the many complexities of researching linguistic and cultural diversity, including the dynamics of language change in migrant communities. Their willingness to share their extensive knowledge of the field stimulated my thinking in many areas of the project.

Finally, in the course of this project I have been able to meet only a handful of Victoria's culturally and linguistically diverse older population and those who care for them through different agencies, but I hope that this report will be of value to all of them through the contribution it makes to the Culturally Equitable Gateways Strategy.
